SGS

OHSAS 18001:2007 certification shows a commitment to occupational health and safety, and a clear and proactive consideration towards your employees. It helps you stand out from the competition and supports you in continuously improving your health and safety management systems.

OHSAS 18001:2007 is the internationally recognised standard that enables organisations to manage operational risks and improve performance. It enables an organisation to effectively manage the health and safety risks of its business activities, reducing risk therefore prevents injury and ill health.

THE BENEFITS

The standard promotes a safe and healthy working environment by providing a framework that allows organisations to identify and reduce their occupational health and safety risks, reduce potential for accidents, aid legislative compliance and improve overall performance.

Employee safety and wellbeing can be improved as a result of objectives and responsibilities being made clearer. Following which all employees are prepared to effectively deal with potential hazards.

Your certificate from SGS demonstrates a high level of commitment to occupational health and safety and can be a benefit when bidding for international contracts, expanding locally, or negotiating insurance premiums. Significant improvement in staff motivation and commitment can be achieved, which as a result, helps improve workplace safety.

HOW THE CERTIFICATION PROCESS WORKS

- Step A - Tailored proposal from SGS.
- Step B – Optional ‘pre-audit’ of readiness and weaknesses.
- Step C – Formal audit ‘Stage 1 – Readiness Review’. Documents and key system elements are evaluated and non-compliances reported.
- Step D – ‘Stage 2’: interviews, examination of records and observation of working practices. Non-conformances are addressed.
- Step E – Surveillance visits to check the system and action plan implementation.
- Step F – Re-certification audit after three years.
